

I chose to have four main interfaces for my webpage. The pages will have a consistent layout.

There will be a header at the top with a title for the page, a navigation bar on the left with links to the other interfaces, and a footer with the site's copyright information. The page name should be at the top because that is traditionally where a page's title goes on any website. The nav bar is off to the side so that it is still highly visible without being in the way of each page's unique content.

The copyright information is at the bottom because it is not the most important part of the site, but it will be visible if anyone wants to see it

The first interface will be the main landing page. It will have my name at the header along with some sort of title such as "web developer" or "professional writer." Something like that will make my image seem more professional. There will be a photo of me to the right so viewers can actually see what I look like. I will also include a brief explanation of the site's purpose: a portfolio of my work.

The "About Me" page will go further in depth regarding my personal information, goals, and skills. There will also be another photo of me since this page focuses on me as a person and worker.

The "Portfolio" page will include a list of my completed projects, such as webpages, blogs, articles—anything I have done involving professional writing and web authoring. Works on the web will have links so viewers can see them firsthand. This is also where my resume will be. I will upload it as a .pdf file and add a link to it so it can be easily accessed by viewers without exiting the browser.

The "Contact" page will include all my contact information. I will have a different line for each piece of information. My mailing address will be on top, then my phone number, then a link to open an email to my email address, then a link to my Facebook page, and finally a link to my Twitter profile. These are the best ways to get in contact with me. I have them ordered from the most direct way of reaching me to the least direct. I am most likely to respond to letters sent to me, and am least likely to respond to Twitter messages.
